

Missing women and missing persons

A missing-person report must receive a serious, risk-based response. I will make missing women, girls and vulnerable people a visible priority in the public-safety plan.

WHAT I WILL BRING FORWARD

- Ask the Police Board for a dedicated capacity review covering missing women and girls, Indigenous people, exploitation risks and unresolved files. Seek additional investigators where workload shows a gap.
- Require a clear family contact pathway, interpreters, culturally appropriate support and prompt preservation of time-sensitive evidence.
- Support lawful regional coordination and independent review of recurring service failures. Work with Indigenous-led organizations and affected families on service design.
- Improve prevention through safe housing, transport, outreach and supports for people escaping violence or exploitation.

Delivery. Request a costed staffing and family-service proposal within 100 days. This capacity is additional to the 15-position financial-crime request; final staffing must reflect case workload and specialist needs.

Public measures. Publish de-identified reporting-to-assessment times, family-update compliance, evidence-preservation performance and independent review progress. Report case outcomes without treating quick closure as the sole measure.

Conditions. Respect a located adult's lawful privacy and safety. Do not publish shelter locations or expose people fleeing abuse. A mayor sets priorities through lawful governance, not investigative directions or assumptions about individual cases.
